ABSTRACT (upto 300 words)

Jean Piaget used the concept of structure to analyze cognitive development, viewing all phenomena as arising from an organizing totality. This idea shares similarities with structural phenomenological psychopathology. Structure is seen as a foundational totality shaping psychic phenomena, and every observed phenomenon refers to this totality, indicating a common internal consistency. Structure pertains to how individuals position themselves in the world and governs interactions between elements. It involves two aspects: essence (uniting individuals throughout existence) and mobility (preserving stability). This dual nature helps individuals recognize their constitutive essence and the opportunities for personality development.

For adults and children, the transformative process and expansion differ due to structural maturity. Healthy adults exhibit balanced organization of fundamental structural categories (spatiality, temporality, interpersonal, corporeality). Children, however, have an immature structure, leading to a distinct world experience centered on corporeality. Initially, children experience an undifferentiated unity between themselves and the world, but as spatiality and temporality mature within the first two years of life, they perceive a stable universe with separations between elements. Interpersonality's specifics are examined as the experience transitions from self-world merging.
